Sermon

It seems our credit-driven society urges us to buy now; so many advertisements have as their underlying message "Why wait?" Improvements in communication erode the notion of waiting further. It is increasingly a strange notion; we have become accustomed to immediacy and swift action.

Given this, it seems almost ludicrous that the church should have with Advent four weeks dedicated to waiting. Is this not the church, looking backward to bygone days, to ideas irrelevant to our society, out of touch and out of date? Would it not be a better idea to abandon Advent altogether?

I don't think so...!

It was only when I was pregnant with my first child that I realized I had completely misunderstood what waiting was about. I have a very low boredom threshold and, consequently, am bad at waiting. Yet no one who is expecting a child wants the waiting to end and the baby to come early—that can only spell heartache. I began to discover that waiting is not just about passing time but that it has a deep and lasting value in and of itself.

Waiting can be a nurturing time. Pregnant waiting is a profoundly creative act, involving a slow growth to new life. This kind of waiting may appear passive externally but internally it consists of never-ending action and is a helpful analogy for the kind of waiting that Advent requires.

For many of us, Advent is such a busy time with all our preparations for Christmas that the thought of stopping and sitting passively is simply impossible. Advent, however, does not demand passivity, but the utmost activity: active internal waiting that knits together new life.

Advent calls us to view the world differently, to see through our illusions and to value people over profits, forgiveness over revenge, mercy over judgment and hope over hopelessness.

WE can be messengers of hope. It is this gift through presence that we can give to, and receive from those with whom we journey in life.

All told, Advent calls us into a state of waiting that recognizes and embraces the procession to the stable; and when we get there, let's embrace this child of Bethlehem, the pure light of God's love, and let Him shine in our hearts, and make our lives new.

Amen

Today, in lieu of memorial flowers from The Ladies Guild/A.C.W., we remember past members
